

Bryn C. Sarvis

Bryn C. Sarvis, Esquire, graduated cum laude from Clemson University where she obtained a Bachelor of Science degree in Management with a concentration in Organizational Behavior and Human Resources Management. Following graduation in 1999, Ms. Sarvis obtained her Professional in Human Resources (PHR) certification and obtained firsthand experience with labor and employment issues as Human Resources Manager for an advertising publishing company. In June 2006, Ms. Sarvis received her Juris Doctor degree, cum laude, from the St. John's University School of Law. Following graduation from law school, Ms. Sarvis was employed by a New York education, municipal, labor, and employment law firm, representing school districts, post-secondary institutions, municipalities, and private sector employers as general or labor counsel and frequently presenting on matters of labor, employment, and education law. Upon returning to South Carolina in 2008, Ms. Sarvis became associated with a similar firm, where she practiced primarily in the areas of civil litigation and employment defense, and later became the supervising civil litigation and employment law attorney for a Lexington firm. In August 2011, Ms. Sarvis opened her own law practice, Sarvis Law, LLC, and represents plaintiffs and defendants in labor and employment matters, unemployment hearings, business disputes, divorce, Family Court cases, probate matters, school law, teacher issues, personal injury claims, debt collection practice matters, and other civil litigation. She is a contributor to the South Carolina Bar's Labor and Employment Law Section's newsletter, speaks regularly on topics such as family law, probate matters, and employment law, and has been a contributing editor to the well-renowned labor and employment arbitration treatise How Arbitration Works.
